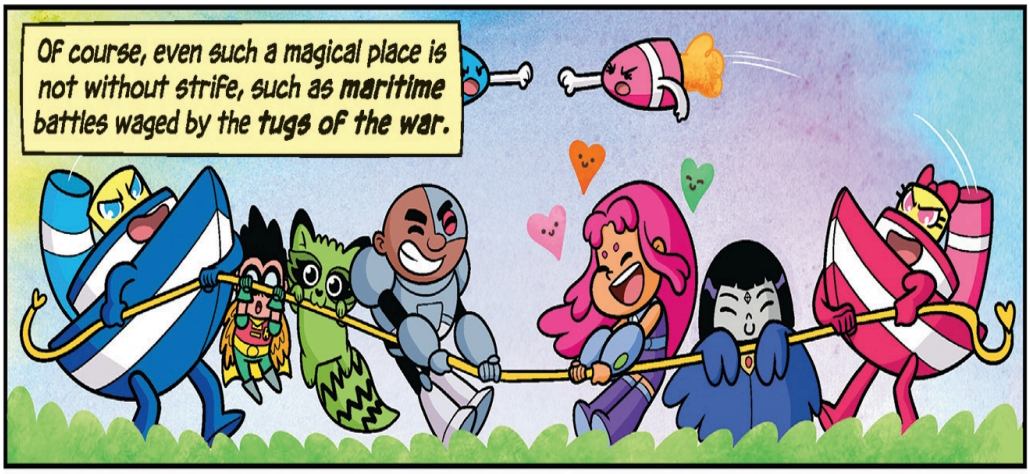
A letter from camp!
I think that's everything. We're ready to go!
Finally. Why do humans never prepare for the coming of Devilance?
I shall be fully prepared in one moment— once I distribute these.
What's this?
Ooh, it could be a surprise birthday card!
It's not your birthday.
That's the surprise!

I apologize for crushing the hope, Cyborg, but it is not the celebration of the birth.
Is it not customary to write the letters to friends when one goes to camp?
Sure, but not to friends who are going with you.
Besides, we haven't left home yet.
Oh. Well, Silkie is not accompanying us to the camp. Perhaps he will enjoy the vicarious experience of reading about the fun that others are having without him.
Farewell, Silkie!
Enjoy the reading!

Dear Silkie...
How are you? I am fine.
I can hardly wait to experience the fabulous adventure that awaits at the camp of the summer.
It was most regrettable that we could not experience it last year, due to the overabundance of marshmallow. For I am told that camp is a wondrous place where we will compete.

There is the three-legged race, although I wonder where I might obtain the necessary additional limb.
We may play games with assorted waterfowl, such as the duck the duck, and the goose.

And engage in the ritual hunting of the scavengers.



Of course, even such a magical place is not without strife, such as maritime battles waged by the tugs of the war.

Still, I am certain that the experience will be even more enjoyable than my very first time away from home...
I will never forget the Gordanian slave pens.
I shall write again soon, and trust that the postal service in Apokolips will deliver my letter most speedily.
Your friend,
Starfire
